Subdued by Police.

A new Evelyn Thaw-a little untutored, cheaply pretty Evelyn Thaw of the tenements—sat this afternoon in the chair where her famous prototype sat a month ago, and told the same story-with some variations, and with far less dramatic effect. It was Helen Van Hagen, the sixteen-year-old girl who is the chief accuser of Raymond Hitchcock, the actor, now on trial before Justice Blanchard.

The youth of the witness and her ignorance made a better impression than did her manner of teiling the narrative. She will probably be on the stand all day to-morrow.

The Thaw trial in its best, or its worst, days never saw a bigger, more disorderly crowd than the one of this afternoon that rushed the doors of the court-room. News had spread that some unsavory slories would probably be told from the stand, and the corridors of the Criminal Courts Building were soon filled with a mob of those moral garbage collectors that such an announcement always brings from their caves. There were no women among them.

The attendants were literally carried off their feet. Policemen came from the Centre Street Court and, thus reinforced, the court officials succeeded in breaking up the press about the door and opening a path for the jurors, the lawyers and the reporters.
